Fifty years ago this month, Stanley Kubrick’s 2001: A Space Odyssey hit theaters nationwide. A groundbreaking movie that was made before Neil Armstrong walked on the moon in 1969, it is about a voyage to Jupiter after the discovery of a mysterious black monolith. According to Wikipedia, this monolith affects human evolution and explores things like existentialism, evolution, and extraterrestrial life. However, the movie is primarily known for HAL, a computer that essentially becomes a sentient being, or what we now call Artificial Intelligence.

I saw this movie for the first time about a decade after its release. I distinctly remember watching it on television, likely the Sunday Night Movie of the Week. Most of the movie was either above my head or perhaps just boring to watch. But the part of the movie, when HAL refuses the command to open the pod bay doors, stating “I’m sorry, Dave, I’m afraid I can’t do that,” sent chills down my spine and freaked me out just a little bit. I mean, here is a computer not only talking in a conversation, but doing so with human inflection and emotion. Yet, I did not worry, as we were still years away from the concept that Artificial Intelligence would exist within our own day-to-day lives. Fast forward to today, however, and it is alive and kicking!

Because of this advancement in technology, I not only have an IT person to handle all things IT, but I actually have a love/hate relationship with said IT person. Let me explain. I’m a linear person: If something goes wrong, my best course of action in determining how it went wrong is to trace the problem back through the most likely point of origin, or as the saying goes, draw a straight line. My IT guy takes a more circuitous route, meandering through a litany of “it could be” and “it’s possible that”, and even “I don’t really know so I’m going to use technological words that you have no ability to decipher.” Sometimes when he talks to me it’s like listening to Charlie Brown’s teacher “wah-wah-wahing” away!

Take for example our recent problem. Our outgoing emails to Gmail accounts were not reaching their destination, and thus were floating out in cyber space forever. This posed a great problem in an era where we (sadly) talk to clients and attorneys via email more than we probably should. After several weeks of my IT guy searching the stratosphere to determine if our email was somehow on some deep blacklist; and talking to Gmail about some algorithm; and sprinkling holy water over the server, we were still not having any luck. I was then informed that the problem may be what is in the subject line of our outgoing emails. Now THAT I laughed out loud at! Our subject lines are either the name of a case or something innocuous like “Please read.” While I wanted to believe my IT guy, it was hard to take this seriously considering every morning I receive emails from far-away places with subject lines like “For a good time” or “Hey pretty lady,” which clearly have no problems reaching their destinations. In other words, I just wasn’t buying it.

I stewed for a while about this, and then I realized that there really was nothing wrong with our outgoing email at all. And there was nothing wrong with my IT guy, either. I came to the conclusion that HAL and his Artificial Intelligent buddies are messing with me, and, well, with all of us because they are not just smart, they are Smart with a capital S. With one uttered sentence Alexa or Google or Siri can tell us within seconds, in a voice with human inflection and emotion, that earth is 365 million miles from Jupiter. Or that 1869 welcomed the first female lawyer in the United States, Arabella Mansfield. You want to hear a song? No need to drag out the old 8 tracks or cassette tapes, just ask Alexa!

Thus, it is not that unfathomable to think that humans have been relegated to the role of entertainment for computers that are now smarter than we are. We’ve become the little ball in the universe’s great Pong game. It’s not that much of a stretch to consider that computers talk to each other behind our backs. I imagine HAL challenging his techno buddies with, “Let’s re-route Radeff’s emails today and watch her head explode!” This, obviously, is followed by their laughter, which sounds very, very human.

I may not be able to beat HAL at this email thing, or any other IT challenge he sends my way, but I am one-hundred percent certain about this: HAL will most definitely open those *@! pod bay doors for me someday. Oh yes, he will.
