I Would Never Have Survived on the Prairie

This month I had the privilege of attending the dedication of Phase Three of The Judges Wall, which is located on the first floor of the Courthouse as you walk into the main Clerk’s Office (see accompanying article below on page 3. It is an impressive display of the judicial officers that have served our District since 1858. I would not call myself a history buff, but I do enjoy learning about historical events or people in Colorado that go beyond the gold rush and Molly Brown surviving the sinking of the Titanic. The Judges Wall gives us a glimpse into the Colorado legal world during the Territorial Era and the early Election Era.

Historically, there’s much written about circuit court judges riding from town to town to mete out justice, but not much about what life might be like for lawyers in those early years. As a child of the television era, I remember shows like Bonanza, Here Come the Brides and Gunsmoke playing out Hollywood’s version of the Wild West. But I don’t remember any lawyers in those shows.

Of course, as a young girl I loved Little House on the Prairie – both the books and the television show. No lawyers there either. Like television can do, Little House romanticized life on the prairie, and I was certain that I would have as much fun and excitement as young Laura seemed to have every week. I mean, Michael Landon was playing her dad! But as I got older, surrounded by the creature comforts of plumbing and a furnace, I had to face the reality that I would never have survived on the prairie. Ever. And I would never have survived as a lawyer on the prairie. Ever.

Think about it – let’s go back 130 years or so. You wake up in the morning to a freezing cabin and immediately head outside to an even colder outhouse. Back inside, there’s no Mr. Coffee, Keurig or Nespresso machine brewing your fuel for the day. “Alexa” cannot turn on your television to catch the latest news because THERE IS NO TELEVISION. And no Alexa. Cranky, deprived of caffeine and your Jimmy Dean microwavable sausage sandwich (right, because there is no microwave), you saddle up the horse and head out to your law office.

The commute has got to be difficult. Sure, it’s no I-25 but by god, there is nary a Starbucks in sight along the way! Nothing but your harmonica to keep you entertained since, well, Sirius Radio isn’t available on that model of Chestnut mare. Finally arriving at your office – perhaps having traveled up hill, both ways, in a snow storm - you start your research on your new client’s issue, but your computer won’t boot up. Why? BECAUSE THERE IS NO COMPUTER! And don’t get me started on handwriting pleadings! Where’s the spell-check? Once done, you walk the pleading you have cleverly labeled “Motion for Emergency Hearing” over to the courthouse for filing. The clerk just smiles: it’ll be a few months before the circuit judge comes riding through. Sigh.

History, like many things, looks better from the rearview mirror than when it actually occurred. But the best part about history is it helps us understand where we came from and what opportunities we have because of those who forged the way before us. So maybe go check out The Judges Wall for a little perspective on this crazy thing we call The Law. Rearview mirror optional.

Chris Radeff
The Judges Wall Project

Since most of us now file almost everything electronically we rarely take that walk down the first floor hallway into the main Clerk’s area anymore. However, the next time you are at the courthouse, make a point of walking down the right hand side where you will see the three phases of the Judges Wall Project. A coordinated effort by the Jefferson County Historical Commission, the 1st Judicial District, and the Colorado Supreme Court Law Library, these walls now house the photographs and biographies of the judicial officers that served the 1st JD from 1858 through today. Along with the photos and biographies, there are sketches done of the changing boundaries of the 1st JD, and the courthouses that have served us over the years. It is a fascinating walk through history!

Writing is its own reward.
